Answer: B,E

Explanation:

Explanation

To design a high availability architecture, three key elements should be considered- redundancy, monitoring, and failover:

Redundancy means that multiple components can perform the same task. The problem of a single point of failure is eliminated because redundant components can take over a task performed by a component that has failed.

Monitoring means checking whether or not a component is working properly.

Failover is the process by which a secondary component becomes primary when the primary component fails.

The best practices introduced here focus on these three key elements. Although high availability can be achieved at many different levels, including the application level and the cloud infrastructure level, here we will focus on the cloud infrastructure level.
