Answer: C

Explanation:

Explanation

By default, DirectAccess is configured to use split tunneling, so that only traffic originally sent towards internal networks will be processed by DirectAccess encapsulation. Traffic sent by the DirectAccess clients towards the Internet will not be processed by DirectAccess encapsulation. In this scenario, a remote DirectAccess client is connected to the internal corporate network and the public Internet at the same time. Some security administrators perceive split tunneling as a security risk, and the use of split tunneling may be prohibited by corporate security policy. In addition, enforcing web browsing policies on remote DirectAccess clients might be desired to reduce the risk of exposure from browsing unapproved web sites. In either case, force tunneling can be configured to meet these requirements.

When force tunneling is enabled, the DirectAccess client sends all traffic, including internal and internet traffic, to be encapsulated by DirectAccess protocol and being sent back to corporate DirectAccess gateway on the enterprise edge network. If force tunneling is enabled, DirectAccess administrators can also define an on-premises proxy server for DirectAccess clients to use.
