NEW QUESTION: 2

A colleague asks you if the added cost of using encrypting tape drives and sending the tapes off-site is warranted, since your IT organization already has large security investments such as firewalls and database table encryption.

What is your response?

- A. Encrypted database tables only protect data against inappropriate access by super users such as database or server administrators abusing root privileges.
- B. The existing firewalls and database table encryption do not replace encrypted tape drives, but implementing an intrusion protection system (IPS) will make tape encryption obsolete.
- C. The correct firewall rule set would make encrypted tape drives obsolete, but there has not always been strong confidence in the firewall administrators.
- D. Encrypt tape drives as part of a defense in depth strategy to ensure that one security mechanism being compromised does not expose all information to a malicious user.

Answer: D

NEW QUESTION: 3

When administrative security is enabled, what is the minimum administrative role needed to create a resource, install, and uninstall an application?
